IN FOCUS

CELEBRATING 8 CONNECTED YEARS

Some anniversaries are marked. Others are felt. Spectrum was the latter.

Infiniti Connects' 8th anniversary wasn't an event you attended — it was one you experienced. Music that gave you goosebumps, theatre that made you laugh until it hurt, art that made you pause, and a room full of people who've built something genuinely rare together.

The evening opened with a Ganesh Vandana performed by Club Aurora, Infiniti Connects' newly launched choir — and from that first note, it was clear this night was going to be different. A musical medley traced eight years of memories and milestones, and by the finale, no one was just watching. The entire room was singing.

This year's theme was Growth — but not the kind that lives on a balance sheet.

I Re:Member, the evening's art showcase, brought hidden talents from within the community into the light.

The celebration was graced by Padma Shri awardee and theatre legend Dr. Anil Rastogi — a living reminder of what a lifetime of dedication to one's craft truly looks like.

Founder Surabhi Srivastava reflected on a journey that began with a small circle of entrepreneurs in Lucknow and has grown into a community held together by trust, collaboration, and relationships that actually mean something.

The evening closed with My Sweethearts — a comedy play performed by community members that was funny, chaotic, and a true highlight.

Eight years. Countless stories. And a long road still ahead.

THOUGHT ROOM

HOW TO STAY VISIBLE WITHOUT CONSTANTLY SELLING

Here's something most people in professional communities quietly struggle with: they want to show up, be remembered, and grow their reputation — but they don't want to feel like they're always pitching something. So they go quiet instead. That tension is real. But it's also built on a false choice.

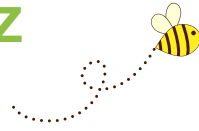

Visibility and selling are not the same thing. The people who tend to be most respected — the ones everyone actually wants to refer business to — are rarely the ones posting the most offers. They're the ones who show up with something genuinely useful, say something honest about a challenge they faced, or just make someone else feel recognised. And they do it consistently, without an agenda attached.

Our WhatsApp group is a good example of this in practice. When it's working well, it's not because someone posted a promotion that landed. It's because a member shared a lesson that saved someone else a headache, or made an introduction that turned into something real, or asked a question that got everyone thinking.

A few things that tend to work well, in case it helps:

Share what you've actually learned. Recognise others. Ask genuine questions. Give before you need anything.

The goal isn't to be seen everywhere. It's to be remembered where it matters.

Where Passion Meets Profession: A Journey of Building Both

Article by : Ankur Kakkar

Can passion and profession truly coexist?

For many, the answer seems obvious. Conventional wisdom often suggests that one must eventually choose between pursuing a successful career and following a lifelong passion. Yet some journeys challenge that belief entirely.

This is one such story.

An engineer by qualification, an entrepreneur by profession, and a musician by passion, I have spent much of my life navigating two seemingly different worlds—business and music. Looking back, I have come to realize that neither competed with the other. Instead, each strengthened the other in ways I could never have anticipated.

The journey began during my engineering days. Like countless young musicians, I dreamed of forming a college band. The vision was clear, but the reality was far less straightforward. Building a band required instruments, infrastructure, and institutional support—resources that were not readily available. Convincing the college administration to invest in a student-led musical initiative seemed like an uphill battle.

Rather than asking for faith, I decided to earn it.

I began participating in inter-college music competitions, consistently securing top positions across numerous events. Each trophy represented more than personal achievement; it became evidence that musical talent existed within the campus and that a vibrant cultural ecosystem could flourish if given the opportunity.

Armed with these accomplishments, I approached the management once again—this time not with a dream alone, but with demonstrated results. The conversation changed.

The administration approved a budget, and what once existed only as an idea began taking tangible shape. With the allocated resources, I procured instruments, organized campus-wide auditions, and brought together talented individuals who shared the same enthusiasm for music. What started as a personal aspiration soon evolved into an official college band, creating opportunities for countless students to showcase their talent.

That experience taught me a lesson that would later become a guiding principle in both business and life:

Before people invest in your vision, they must first witness your commitment to it. After graduation, life entered a new phase. Like many young professionals, I stepped into the corporate world. Eventually, I embarked on the entrepreneurial journey and founded my own IT company.

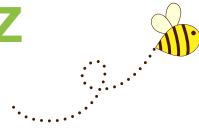

Building a business from the ground up demanded relentless focus. Every entrepreneur understands the realities—financial pressures, operational complexities, talent acquisition, strategic decision-making, and the constant uncertainty that accompanies growth.

The business grew steadily.

But somewhere along the way, music quietly moved into the background.

Years passed. Professional milestones accumulated. Yet despite the progress, I often felt a subtle void. The passion that had once energized my days and defined my identity had become an occasional visitor rather than a constant companion.

Contd.

Where Passion Meets Profession: A Journey of Building Both

Article by : Ankur Kakkar

WayRaag Band

Entrepreneurship taught me how to build an organization, but it also taught me something equally important: success feels incomplete when disconnected from the pursuits that genuinely inspire you. As the company reached a more stable and mature phase, I made a conscious decision to reconnect with music.

The return was far from effortless. The industry had evolved. Networks had changed. Momentum had to be rebuilt from scratch. Re-entering a space after years of limited involvement required humility, patience, and renewed dedication. Yet passion has a remarkable way of reigniting dormant dreams.

Within six to eight months, I was back on stage—performing again, rebuilding my band, reconnecting with audiences, and rediscovering the exhilaration that had first captivated me during my college years. What began as a personal comeback gradually transformed into something much larger. Today, I have the privilege of balancing two worlds that once seemed impossible to pursue simultaneously. Over the years, I have been part of more than 1,500 live performances across multiple cities in India, performing for diverse audiences and creating memorable experiences through music. The journey also expanded beyond performing.

Driven by a deeper understanding of the entertainment ecosystem, I ventured into artist management and entertainment services. Today, I oversee entertainment operations for more than ten hospitality and lifestyle properties, helping curate experiences that bring together artists, audiences, and businesses. What started as a college band has evolved into an entrepreneurial extension of my passion. And perhaps that is the most rewarding outcome of all.

If this journey has taught me anything, it is that success is rarely linear.

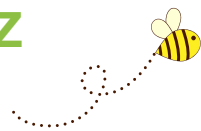

There are seasons when responsibilities demand your complete attention. There are periods when dreams must wait patiently in the background. There are moments when progress appears slow and uncertainty feels overwhelming. But genuine passion never truly disappears. It waits. It evolves. And when you choose to return to it with sincerity and commitment, it often rewards you in ways you never expected.

Today, whether I am leading business discussions, building teams, managing artists, designing entertainment experiences, or performing on stage, I carry the same belief that guided me as a young engineering student years ago:

Believe in your vision. Stay persistent. Earn trust through action. And never stop investing in what makes you come alive. Because true success is not merely about building a career. It is about building a life where ambition and passion are not rivals—but partners in creating something meaningful.
